Natural Disasters

A Wildfire near Los Angeles

Firefighters in California report that three people have died in a wildfire near Los Angeles. The fire started on Sunday, and the casualties were found early this morning. The wildfire has been classified as a type 1 wildfire, and so far it has already destroyed a large area of parkland and some property. A park ranger said that there are strong winds in the area of the fire, which are making it difficult to get the fire under control. Official warnings from environmental organisations state the concern that these powerful winds will make the fire spin, which could then turn into a fire tornado. As a result, people in several towns have already left the area and many more will leave today.

C Avalanche in the Alps

Yesterday afternoon, rescuers found a group of skiers who were missing after an avalanche occurred in the French Alps on Tuesday. The skiers were enjoying themselves when it suddenly started snowing. They were found in an area of forest near the ski resort, where they were trying to escape from the severe blizzard. There was still heavy snow on Tuesday night, which made it more difficult for the rescuers to locate the group. One witness at the rescue said, "It is a miracle! The experts were very daring and worked tirelessly to find the group." French police say that all the skiers are now safe and have been taken to hospital to be examined. Experts say you should not go skiing when the temperature suddenly rises because this increases the possibility of avalanches.

Flooding in England

Many parts of England are flooded and under water today, following two days of violent thunderstorms and hailstorms. People in the north woke up to see that there is water everywhere, with flash floods covering the city of York and several smaller towns. According to some residents, this is the second time this year that their homes have flooded, but these flash floods were unexpected. One local explains, "The weather is just bizarre at the moment. I'm sure storms and flooding are happening more frequently here – it's all because of global warming. I believe in it, and what's more, we are going to suffer more and more natural disasters." Experts say that the unpredictable weather will continue for this week and that many more towns will suffer flash flooding. People should prepare themselves and their homes.

Volcano interest in Sicily D

Vulcanologists – or people who study volcanoes – from all over the world will arrive in Sicily today to study the volcanic eruption of Mount Etna. Mount Etna is the second biggest volcano in Europe and is of great interest at the moment. The volcano is unusually active and many experts are coming to see what is happening for themselves. They will spend as much time as necessary here, and they will research the volcano and the destruction in more detail. The volcano is playing havoc in the area and affecting many locals in various ways. Lava and ash have destroyed several houses at the base of the volcano, and smoke is visible for miles. The airport at Catania is closed for safety reasons.
